

The Family of David & Rose Brown

Canada

David and Rose Brown* were a product of their times. David grew up in the small town of Wodizlaw, Poland and lost his parents and siblings in the Holocaust. Following his sole surviving brother, he moved to Toronto to start a new life. Rose Weisbloom was also from Poland and immigrated to Toronto during the Depression. Due to the difficult times, Rose had to leave school in order to work and help support her family. David and Rose met in Toronto and married.

Like many of their generation, David and Rose struggled tirelessly to be able to give their children the opportunities they had not had. At great personal sacrifice, they sent their son and daughter to the Associated Hebrew Day School of Toronto. Giving their children a Jewish education was the obvious decision. In their home, tzedakah was part of everyday life. Their generosity was never limited by their financial circumstances, as there were always those whose needs were greater than their own. With time, the business they built together flourished and they were able to visit their beloved Israel often. They were also able to share their good fortune and contribute to many Jewish organizations, which they did with a sense of responsibility and gratitude.

Their children, Morland, and Glennie and Nathan Lindenberg are a product of their times and have enjoyed the blessings of privileged life. By supporting the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, they honour the memory of their parents and fulfill what was most important to them – supporting Jewish education and Israel.

The Lindenberg / Brown Family have tried to instill in their next generation, Ira, and Joanna & Adam, devotion to community, tzedakah and love of Israel and the Jewish people. It is hoped that their grandparents' values and good deeds will be their legacy and inspiration, as they were for their children.
